A public high school in Hamden, Connecticut has started a mandatory "drop-out prevention program" for students deemed academically unprepared to enter college and vocational programs. The school's paper in Wednesday's Hartford Courant describes the program as "widely criticized by its opponents and opponents to its opponents." And it is. Many people believe high schools should be about educating students to be productive and enter higher education. The dropout prevention program is decidedly less than this. Some colleges have already implemented their own. The University of California, Berkeley, said it was allowing students enrolled in at least 10 classes to drop out of a semester without penalty. Another student could opt out of the first four classes of the semester. This past year, students in California were allowed to drop out of their first course if they attended only one class. But this past week, I reported on a North Carolina high school that was experimenting with allowing students to drop out of class.

CursorLock is a Windows application for limiting the cursor to the monitor where a game is active. Most programs have the concept of "dirty windows". In Windows, these are the windows that change their contents frequently and need to be refreshed. In the past, this could lead to rather long waits for programs to update their contents, so there was no harm in rapidly loading the windows containing such data. However, not all programs do this any more. Modern programs are smarter, and can load only the contents of the dirty windows when needed. If you need to load the contents of dirty windows frequently, you'll have to wait until they're loaded and then you'll have to wait again until they change. This is far more annoying than using programs that do not load the contents of the dirty windows at all. Dirty window refresher is the application to fix this annoying problem: as soon as you launch it, it automatically loads the contents of your dirty windows and refreshes them for you. Not just a tool for programmers Dirty window refresher is a very versatile tool that has become much more useful over the years. Today, the program not only refreshes the contents of your dirty windows, but it also does many other useful things, such as restoring icons from the Trash or opening recently closed programs and files. Very little configuration is required to get the best out of the program. It can automatically detect all the folders where you store your programs and their contents, and it loads all the contents of your dirty windows in one go. Closing the program may be a bit annoying, but that's the price you have to pay to have the program update the contents of your dirty windows. Most programs have the concept of "dirty windows". Extras: Limits the mouse cursor to the selected monitor Consistent mouse cursor position when switching windows Automatically detects active windows Disable mouse cursor movement to a secondary monitor Support for XInput 1.2 and USB 2.0 System: Windows 2000/XP/2003 File Size: 46KB Installer: 1,100KB License: Freeware, shareware Getting the full potential out of your machine is very important. Whether you want to improve the overall performance of your computer, or you just want to manage the resources of your machine to optimize your productivity, in this section, we show you how to go about doing just that. We start off by taking a look at tuning your computer's performance in general, and then move on to perform benchmarks to get a better idea of how your computer is currently performing. Tuning your PC's Performance The first thing you need to do is adjust the level of priority given to your hardware, and this is something that you need to do regularly. This is because it is easy to neglect certain aspects of your PC that may have a negative effect on its performance, and it will perform more poorly as a result. To begin with, it is best to have the following four settings enabled on your computer: Disk Defragmentation Virtual Memory UAC Processor Capping Not only does this make it easier to manage your computer's resources, but it will also make sure that your PC is performing at its best. However, you need to make sure that the optimal settings are enabled when this occurs, because there may be a penalty if you do not. So, what should you enable? Running Disk Defragmentation If you run your computer for long periods of time, then it is possible that your disk may become fragmented. When this occurs, it will be harder to move files around, and it will take longer to open programs. This is why it is important to schedule defragmentation and make sure that it is run daily. In Windows Vista, there is a disk defragmentation tool built-in which you can use to do this. You can do this by selecting Start | Run, entering "defrag" and clicking OK. A small window will appear, and you can select Defragment Now, and if you do not have any files that are at risk of becoming fragmented, you can also select this option. Otherwise, you can leave it for a later time. Although Windows 7 does not include this tool, you can still use the built-in defrag
