To download the latest version of Quartus Iii Web Edition, please visit the the field of graphic arts, there is currently a strong demand for hard copying materials that can produce clear, sharp images with high resolution. To meet this demand, improvements in a variety of characteristics such as quality, and high image density and resolution are required. Hitherto, various hard copying materials have been proposed. In particular, an inkjet method using an aqueous ink composition that has excellent storage stability and high drying properties, and a pressure sensitive recording method using an ink having a high color staining property on a recording medium are the methods in wide use. However, inkjet inks are generally susceptible to variations in ink compositions and have the disadvantage that the image density and resolution are readily deteriorated by drying. As a means of improving the inkjet method, various proposals have been made. For example, there is known the method which comprises coexisting solvents with each other so as to obtain an ink having a high degree of penetrability in paper (see, for example, Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 11-249766). The solvents described in this patent publication are used in view of the fact that solvents such as chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) used as a solvent have come under fire for their ozone destroying capacity. In this method, however, the solvents are necessary, and in addition, the problem of ozone deterioration is not overcome. Accordingly, to resolve this problem, there have been still proposed methods of reducing ozone-destroying organic solvents. For example, there is known a method comprising using three or more solvents of specific types in combination (see Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 10-339010). In addition, another method is known which comprises using an amide solvent of a low boiling point and a low dielectric constant (see, for 1cd36666d
