Progestins have been used in oral contraceptive formulations in the past. Research on their effect on the different plasma hormone levels has been inconclusive. In some studies it was found that the early post-coital levels of follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH) were increased but that the levels of luteinizing hormone (LH) were decreased. Most studies have found that the early post-coital levels of LH were increased. Most studies have found that the early post-coital levels of LH were increased. This paper will deal with the studies reporting changes in plasma FSH and LH levels and those reporting other interesting effects of progestins on the pituitary-ovarian axis. FACTORS INFLUENCING SEXUAL AFFAIRS: A STUDY OF TRAINING DOCTORS IN MUMBAI. This study set out to gain an in-depth understanding of factors influencing the sexual affairs of medical students at a medical college in India. Data were collected through in-depth interviews of four trainee medical doctors from the class of 2013. A hermeneutic cycle of analysis was undertaken to reveal new insights in the subject. Twenty-five factors were identified that impacted on intimate and sexual relationships between men and women. These included: an anticipation of marriage, and a minimisation of the effects of social and cultural influences. The most critical factor identified was time. At the end of medical school, the training doctor had lost his or her early confidence, and sought reassurance from someone outside the medical profession. The early sexual experiences of medical students need to be investigated to inform training and education interventions. Seth Roemer
